The Sunday Gentle Review

This is the sheet that connects the week. It's short on purpose — fifteen minutes with a warm drink, done once and then left alone.

It's not a performance review of your week, and it is emphatically not the energetic-Thursday-planner's Sunday ritual with a nicer font. There are no goals sections, no momentum language, no "crush next week." Just six warm prompts and a soft next step.

1. Pick a Sunday time that already exists: with the late-morning coffee, or early evening, or whatever slot your week naturally offers.
2. Answer briefly. Three words beats a paragraph. This sheet is a mirror, not an essay assignment.
3. Close by carrying forward exactly one energy lesson — and only one. Next week is new; nothing is owed.

When this sheet is used with the rest of the pack, it works like this: the map (sheet 1) collects weather, the matcher (2) keeps tasks sorted, and this sheet is where the two are gently compared against reality for a minute — then left alone till next Sunday.

One review a week beats none. Two reviews a week helps until it doesn't; you'll know.

Sunday Gentle Review

Week of _____ · done with a drink, in about fifteen minutes, briefly.

1 · Weather check

Look at your Weekly Energy Map. What did the week's weather mostly do?

Mostly it was a _____ week — and my flattest honest stretch was _____.

2 · What actually happened vs. what was planned

Hours tracker says: planned _____ h, actual colored _____ h. The plan was closer to honest on which days?

3 · Quiet wins — the small-checks edition

Three small things that got checked anyway (matching a level-1 column counts as the same win as a level-5):

1. _____ 2. _____ 3. _____

4 · What cost more than it gave

One thing, one honest line about why (the drain sorter may already have an answer for this one):

_____

5 · What I want more of — not more roadmap, more of the feeling

Write the feeling, not the task. Then the smallest experimental dose of it for this week:

_____

6 · One carry forward — that's all

One energy lesson from this week, stated in nine words or fewer, that next-week me gets to keep:

_____

E.g., "Mondays want slow starts," "Walking meetings beat seated ones," "Two real hours is a full day."

FORECAST FOR NEXT MONDAY — HONEST BATTERY GUESS	THE FIRST SMALL, KIND THING I'M DOING MONDAY
